May/June 2004

Seth Kellogg, Marjorie Rines, Robert H. Stymeist and Jeremiah Trimble

May had near-normal temperatures, was very cloudy, and had slightly less precipitation — though with an excess of rainy days. The mercury averaged 58.9° in Boston, just 0.4° above normal, but 3.8° warmer than the very cold May of last year. The high in Boston was 89° on May 15, and the low was 40° on May 5. There were fourteen days with measurable amounts of rain during May, totaling 3.08 inches for Boston. The weather was ideal for the birding community: lots of southerly winds, with some adverse weather in between that grounded migrants for a few days. Southwest winds, those most favorable during spring migration, were noted on May 1, 2, 6, 9, 14, and 15. From May 16 through May 23 the winds were predominantly out of the east or northeast, and grounded migrants persisted at many locations due to the inclement weather.

The month of June was cool with the temperature average of 66.5° in Boston, 1.5° below normal. There were only two warm spells, June 8-9 and June 15-17; the high in Boston was 93° on June 9. Total rainfall was just 1.95 inches in Boston, 1.27 inches below average.

WATERFOWL THROUGH ALCIDS

Snow Geese are occasionally observed in Massachusetts during May, with over 20 records during the last 10 years. This year, one Snow Goose was observed in Pittsfield on May 15, and three were found earlier in the month in Dalton. Interestingly, there are three June records and a single July record for Massachusetts.

A Tundra Swan was discovered on the first of May at Quabbin Reservoir. This represents the latest spring record, and first May record, for Massachusetts. Tundra Swans have been observed at least a few times through the third week of April but are rare after March. Redheads are nearly as unusual in Massachusetts this late in the spring. One was seen in Braintree through May 4. There are only three previous May records, although there is a single June record from Nantucket on June 5, 1998. Another interesting late Aythya was a Ring-necked Duck recorded on June 11 in Wellesley, a species that has been confirmed nesting in Massachusetts fewer than five times.

The two King Eiders observed in early May at Nantucket and Salem were interesting, but not atypical of the season. The male Harlequin Duck found at Rockport on the late date of June 18 is another story. There are only three previous summer records for this species in Massachusetts. For the fifth summer in a row, a female Common Goldeneye spent the early summer at Turners Falls. This year she was joined briefly by a male, and the two were actually observed mating. Although Common Goldeneye nest as far south as central Maine, there are no breeding records for Massachusetts. Beyond the observed copulation, there was no other evidence that these birds were nesting.

A few Red-throated Loons lingered into the beginning of June. The most interesting loon sighting of the period involved the Pacific Loon that was discovered on May 23 at Chappaquiddick on Martha's Vineyard. It is always nice to hear of breeding Common Loons in Massachusetts. A pair was discovered in Princeton with two young on June 27.

An American White Pelican was observed in Duxbury on June 14. Unfortunately, it proved restless and was not seen after that day. American White Pelican is a casual visitor to Massachusetts. There are over twenty-five records in the last twenty years. Interestingly, this is the first June record for Massachusetts, although there are a number of May and July records.

American Bitterns were well-reported throughout the state this spring and into the breeding season. There were at least nine Least Bitterns seen during the period, including three at Plum Island on May 31. Plum Island, and in particular the North Pool, has historically been a very important breeding area for this, and other, freshwater marsh species. They have declined significantly over the last few decades, so a sighting of more than one bird at a known breeding locality is promising.

A White Ibis was found in Mashpee on May 29. This southeastern species has only been observed in Massachusetts eighteen times previously, the last sighting being April 27- May 4, 2003, at Allen's Pond in South Dartmouth.

Mississippi Kites have become fairly routine, or at least annual, on Cape Cod over the last few years. Up to nine were found throughout the period this year, all from outer Cape Cod, except for one that was seen along the Cape Cod Canal and a second spotted for three consecutive days from Chickatawbut Hill in Quincy. Mississippi Kites rarely linger in migration, so the Quincy bird was exceptional, not only for its off-Cape location, but for its three-day stay.

A pair of Northern Harriers lingered in Windsor from the middle of May until mid-June, leading to speculation of breeding, but no evidence was forthcoming. Three Rough-legged Hawks were encountered during early May in northeastern Massachusetts. These are the first May records for Massachusetts, although they are routinely observed at hawk watches through mid-April.

Plum Island, and in particular the North Pool, proved to be an excellent site for more than just Least Bitterns during the late spring and early summer, as it has in many past years. As many as four King Rails, two Sora, and two Common Moorhens were also seen there during the period. All of the species rely on freshwater marshes that are becoming increasingly difficult to find in Massachusetts. There is no other site in Massachusetts with such a concentration of these rare species. Single Sandhill Cranes were observed a few days apart in Petersham and New Marlboro and may have represented the same bird.

Although quite common in fall migration, the western subspecies of Willet (Catoptrophorus inornatus) is very rare during the spring in Massachusetts. One such individual spent almost the whole month of June on North Monomoy Island in Chatham. A rare visitor to Massachusetts, there are only about two dozen previous records of Bar-tailed Godwit. There are two subspecies of Bar-tailed Godwit. The nominate subspecies (Limosa lapponica lapponica) breeds in northern Europe, while L.l. baueri breeds in eastern Siberia and western Alaska. The majority of records for Massachusetts involve the nominate subspecies. In fact, there are only two previous records of baueri for the state, one from Monomoy in August 1988 and another from May 4, 2002 on Martha's Vineyard. An amazing three Bar-tailed Godwits were found in Chatham during this report period! The first bird, in alternate plumage, was discovered on North Monomoy on May 9 and was determined to be of the Alaskan subspecies, L.l. baueri. Unfortunately, this individual was only observed for a single day. However, three days later, another alternate-plumaged Bar-tailed Godwit of the nominate subspecies was found on North Monomoy. If things couldn't get more exciting, yet another Bar-tailed Godwit, this bird in basic plumage, was seen on June 5 in the same area. Chatham rounded out its shorebird rarities for the season with an alternate-plumaged Curlew Sandpiper seen at the end of June.

An adult Pomarine Jaeger put on an impressive show in Osterville. It hung out near a boat ramp for nearly a week, giving birders an unusual opportunity to leisurely study one of these impressive birds. One of the most exciting records of the season was the Black-tailed Gull that was reported from Lynn Beach on June 11. If accepted by the Massachusetts Avian Records Committee (MARC), this would represent the first state record for this Asiatic gull in Massachusetts. This species has been turning up at many localities through North America and has recently occurred in several nearby states, including Rhode Island and New York. The Sandwich Tern found a week earlier was also an exciting find. Massachusetts came very close to an Atlantic alcid sweep for the month of May, missing only Thick-billed Murre and Dovekie, an impressive feat considering the time of year.

YOUNG GREAT HORNED OWL BY SANDY SELENSKY

DOVES THROUGH FINCHES

Many observers noted how satisfactory this year's migration was; in fact, the weather cooperated this spring with winds from the south on eight of the first fifteen days of May. The first two days recorded temperatures 14° degrees above average, with moderate southwest winds. This May was similar to last year, with periods of southerly winds to bring up the migrants, followed by periods of northerly winds to ground them, allowing birders more time to enjoy the migration.

Nineteen species of warblers were recorded on May 2 at Mt. Auburn, with similar results at Marblehead Neck early in the month. A really nice wave of migrants was noted the morning of May 7. The winds the previous day were out of the southwest, and the temperature was in the 80° range throughout the state, a good 13° above the average.

One of the best areas in the state to witness the diurnal migration in spring is from the first mile and a half of the Parker River National Wildlife Refuge on Plum Island. Rick Heil, who has on many occasions seen these fallouts, tells us: "Perhaps the easiest and most accessible spot for viewing is in front of the restroom/visitor center at lot number one. Strong southwest, west, or northwest winds will push migrating birds out to the island, and such winds consistently produce the best flights, some of which are comprised of many thousands of northbound birds streaming along the dunes." Rick witnessed two major fallouts this spring, the first on May 7, which included sixteen species of warblers. The big surprise of that morning was the count of 654 migrating American Goldfinches in just over two hours. Flock after flock, sometimes as many as 25-45 individuals in each, passed northward along the dunes and over lot one. On May 11, another massive fallout included 71 Ruby-throated Hummingbirds, 93 Eastern Kingbirds, 132 Blue Jays, and 17 warbler species, including 15 Northern Parula, 62 Yellow, and 2 Cape May warblers. There were 77 Bobolinks, 5 Orchard and 24 Baltimore orioles, 2 Pine Siskins, and even a Dickcissel, an unusual spring migrant. Truly amazing was the goldfinch flight that occurred between 8:00 a.m. and 11:30 a.m., resulting in a total tally of 2415. Flock after flock (100+ individuals in several flocks) passed over every few minutes. This morning's count not only eclipsed the count on May 7, but also a previous, daylong tally Rick made here of 522 migrants on May 10, 2002.

On May 12, a fallout occurred at the Beech Forest in the National Seashore in Provincetown, with 20 species of warblers and a good assortment of other migrants, including a Summer Tanager, noted. Generally the lower Cape gets its best migration late in May. On May 24, the other cape — Cape Ann — hosted excellent numbers of late spring migrants, including 8 Yellow-bellied Flycatchers, a Philadelphia Vireo, 64 Magnolia, 33 Black-throated Green, 26 Blackpoll, 27 Redstart, 10 Canada, and 6 Mourning warblers.

On May 25, the inclement weather grounded hoards of migrants along the coast and at inland locations as well. In Worcester the weather was cool and foggy, and the ground was saturated from the numerous storms the night before. Mark Lynch noted that migrants were singing, providing one of the more unusual dawn choruses he has heard in the city. As many as nine Swainson's and one Gray-cheeked thrush sang throughout the morning, and a Philadelphia Vireo was heard as well in the Newton Hill Park. At Plum Island, it was flycatcher day on May 25. Rick Heil recorded 2 Olive-sided, 12 Pewees, 16 Yellow-bellied, 6 Alder, 5 Willow, 6 "Traill's," 8 Least, 15 Empidonax, and 10 kingbirds.

The cold rains associated with this last grounding of migrants persisted for several days and apparently had an ill effect on some birds: several martins perched by Stage Island Pool (far from the colony) were nearly moribund. Birders were able to approach these birds very closely.

Two long-term migration surveys, the census of Hampden County by the Allen Bird Club and the Essex County Ornithological Club survey of the Ipswich River, provide us with continuing data to show us the trends and fluctuations of bird populations. On May 15, the members of the Allen Bird Club conducted the 42nd annual census of birds in Hampden County. Some of the highlights included: 137 Red-bellied Woodpeckers (all-time high for this survey), 39 Eastern Wood-Pewees, 67 Great Crested Flycatchers, 133 Warbling and 138 Red-eyed vireos, 230 Wood Thrushes, 52 Blue-winged Warblers, 259 Yellow, and 68 Black-and-white warblers, 147 Ovenbirds, 120 Common Yellowthroats, 110 Scarlet Tanagers, 110 Rose-breasted Grosbeaks, and 324 Baltimore Orioles. Seth Kellogg reported lower than normal counts this year for Black-capped Chickadee and Eastern Bluebird, while Brown Thrasher, at only nine individuals, was at an all-time low. The Essex County Ornithological Club held its 98th annual mid-May canoe trip on May 15, with perfect conditions but surprisingly disappointing results. The trip covered over ten miles of river edge with good numbers of many species: Warbling Vireo, 15; Yellow Warbler, 27; Common Yellowthroat, 42; and Baltimore Oriole, 55. The misses included Veery, Ovenbird, and Swamp Sparrow, and there were low numbers for Blue-gray Gnatcatcher (3), Black-throated Green Warbler (1) and Scarlet Tanager (5).

Since 1987 Glenn d'Entremont has conducted a Whip-poor-will survey of Myles Standish State Forest in Plymouth, a major breeding area for this species in Massachusetts. He tallied 32 this year, but noted that many of these were well away from the road, and in previous years might have been drowned out by birds calling closer to the census site. He attributes this change to the growth of the trees near the road, eliminating their habitat.

One of the more unusual reports this period was the fourth Martha's Vineyard record of White-winged Dove; this bird was photographed in Chilmark from May 13-15. Another White-winged Dove showed up at a feeder on Morris Island in Chatham on June 8-9. Monk Parakeets are still very scarce in the state: the only report was of three individuals from South Dartmouth. Barn Owl sightings in Massachusetts are generally restricted to their breeding territory on the islands south of Cape Cod, so an individual flushed from a pine grove on the Salisbury State Beach Reservation on May 1 was exceptional. A Chuck-will's-widow returned to the White Cedar Swamp area of the National Seashore in Wellfleet for the eighth year in a row, and others were noted from Marblehead, West Gloucester, Holyoke and Chesterfield. Common Ravens continued their incursion east and successfully nested in Manchester, and two pairs of ravens nested in Milton: one at Fowl Meadow and the other in the Blue Hills. The Manchester ravens are a first breeding record for Essex County. Other unusual raven sightings were in Medford and Sudbury.

Among the 35 warbler species reported during the period were 4 Golden-winged, 2 Orange-crowned, 2 Yellow-throated, 4 Prothonotary, 8 Kentucky, 9 Hooded, and a Yellow-breasted Chat. Unusual sparrows included reports of 5 Clay-colored Sparrows and 2 Nelson's Sharp-tailed Sparrows, both from Martha's Vineyard. Four Blue Grosbeaks and two Dickcissels were noted, and a number of reports of Pine Siskins and Evening Grosbeaks were noted, as well as two Red Crossbills.
