Greenberg, Russell S., and Judy A. Gradwohl. 1980. Observations of paired Canada Warblers Wilsonia canadensis during migration in Panama. Ibis 122 (4): 509-512.

These researchers, studying foraging flocks of antbirds in Panama, made incidental observations on the spring migrant Canada Warblers that associated with the antbird flocks. In a significantly high percentage of all cases, the Canada Warblers occurred in what appeared to be male-female pairs. There are several possible reasons for this, and proving or disproving any of them would be difficult; however, one potential explanation is that the birds are actually migrating north in pairs — a phenomenon which is generally unknown in passerines. Further observations along the Canada Warbler's migratory route or on the breeding grounds might shed more light on the question. — K.K.
