A WARBLER RECOVERY

ROBERT J. PANTLE

Every year during the spring breeding season I have tried to mist net a wooded hillside not far from my home in order to determine the makeup of species and their breeding success on an annual basis. During the course of 1964, on June 28, a female Canada Warbler (Wilsonia Canadensis) with a brood patch was duly banded and recorded.

Two years later, on June 26, this female repeated in the same net lane. She was obviously breeding as she had a brood patch. Subsequent banding on the same hillside during the breeding seasons did not produce this Canada Warbler again. However, late summer of 1971 I received a recovery card from the Banding Office on this female.

The recovery is as follows: found dead 5/25/71 in Cleveland Heights, Ohio. Two points are of particular interest. The age of this Canada was approximately eight years and the point of recovery was about 300 miles southwest of banding.
