

An unusual song of the Slate-colored Junco.—On about March 22, 1948, I heard high in the trees about my home an unfamiliar bird song: a thin trill followed by a rapid group of soft tweets—usually four but sometimes less. The trill was like a junco's, but the complete song suggested a warbler. I could not locate the singer. On March 24 I again heard the song and this time found the bird about 60 feet up in an oak; it was a Slate-colored Junco (Junco hyemalis). After singing a minute or so longer it gave chase to another Junco a few feet away and was lost to sight. On March 25 I heard the same song, again given from a high perch. On each occasion that I heard the Junco it was about 8:00 a.m. Saunders (1942, Summer Birds of the Allegany State Park, N.Y. State Mus. Handbook 18:297) records, as unusual, a similar song by a Slate-colored Junco on its breeding ground.—HERVEY BRACKBILL, 4608 Springdale Avenue, Baltimore 7, Maryland.
